New Mexico Water Quality Commission April 22nd 2013

Atten: Pam Casteneda

New Mexico Water Quality Control Commission has an opportunity to provide our state with improved regulations that define how ground water should be monitored and protected at copper mining operations.

After months of discussions among advisory committees and working groups that include government, academics, environmental interest groups and industry, the New Mexico Environment Department has submitted to the WQCC its "Proposed Copper Rules." The NMED recommends these rules replace our current bureaucratic, inconsistent system with a strict, consistent, clear and reliable framework to protect ground water today and for years after operations cease.

This is the kind of common sense reform we should expect from our government officials – ensuring the environment is protected while also giving an industry critical to our economy the kind of charity it needs to make additional investments and create jobs – jobs our rural southwestern communities depend on.

For the sake of our groundwater and New Mexico's economy, I encourage approval of these proposed copper rules.

Respectfully,

Edward Encinas, Mayor
